

Aspirations

We would like to see the department more actively promoting the recruitment of students and faculty from traditionally underrepresented backgrounds. We would also like to see the LSE host more initiatives similar to the University of Chicago's Summer Institute,<sup>7</sup> which would do not have affiliation with the School an opportunity to further their skill works.

In addition to working about issues in economics, we also wish to address important structural issues which disproportionately affect "minoritised"<sup>8</sup> groups. For example, and in our curriculum to be organised around questions and the theoretical models. The examples used should relate in a meaningful way to individuals and communities who have been traditionally underrepresented with their methods, applications pertaining to minoritised groups but as core components of the standard curriculum and research on issues that have been given in our curriculum from minoritised groups. We have real ownership over this process.<sup>9</sup> In addition to working towards representation of these groups within our student body and faculty, this means fairly acknowledging the work of external collaborators from minoritised groups and taking an active interest in helping them overcome the structural barriers to their success as economists.<sup>10</sup>

Benefit to the Department

By championing such initiatives, the economics f
